It was also good to see him talk more about the role of finance in war and poverty. But we are seeing an increase in the role of finance and investment in wars. The US, Britain, and the EU have all expanded the financial sector in the face of growing concerns about the risks involved. Today, the US and the EU have created a new kind of international institution, the World Bank and International Monetary Fund. Peter, a professor in political economy at LSE, has done his fair share in bringing into view this vision. I learned a lot about these issues from Peter's talk—notably, the importance of collective action rather than government intervention and, in particular, how we're witnessing mass social movements for justice. I also enjoyed the talk about the rise of the internet as technology allows for instantaneous communication and discussion via digital networks.
